Colour for well-being

The latest innovations in Mamoli series of taps and fittings permit full use of the benefits of chromotherapy.

Whether it is actually possible to use colour to heal is the subject of debate. What, however, appears to be unquestionable is that light has a direct influence not only on our health, but also on our mood, our well-being, our state of mind. It is also certain that this influence is due not only to the level of intensity of the light, but also to its spectrum and, therefore, in the final analysis, its colour. After all, when writing his Theory of Colours, did not Goethe himself invite us not to underestimate the sentimental and subjective aspects of colours? However, inspired by such observations, awareness of the effects of colours and light on our organism or even, simply on our equilibrium is growing. And it was consideration of this new awareness that caused Mamoli, a historical brand made in Italy that over the years has been a trailblazer in changing the face of bathrooms, to devise a series of products inspired by “chromotherapy”. What is more, if it is true that to a growing extent bathrooms are being turned into well-being areas within the home, a company like Mamoli, undoubtedly one of the key players in this transformation, could not fail to be attentive to all the possible variations of the concept of “well-being”. Water, light and colour, in this respect, thus represent an integrated force that is able to synergetically produce a whole range of effects on our bodies, all targeted to obtaining every possible sensation of well-being: from energy to balance, from satisfaction to peace and gratification. A series of LEDs integrated into the shower head in fact turn the water jet into a carrier of light and colour, with a wide range of colour choices. With two standard programs and nine programmable colours it is therefore possible to create the combination of water, light and colour most in tune with your current state of mind. These shower heads are remarkable for their design too, and blend in perfectly with the other products in the Mamoli series of taps and fittings permitting you to take another step towards creating a complete well-being centre within the walls of your home.
